Sepp Blatter's crusade to protect the interests of national teams worldwide was greatly strengthened when the 2008 FIFA Congress in Sydney overwhelmingly approved his "6+5" concept. This would require clubs to field six players eligible to play for their country's national team. The voting was 155 to 5. Stiff opposition came from the European Union which forbids the restriction of movement on workers within its boundaries. Only 27 of the 208 nations affiliated to FIFA are within the EU, but with the flow of players to the EU greater than ever, the "6+5" concept would be unworkable without its cooperation. The concept was proposed amid growing dissatisfaction with the power wielded by a few elite clubs and leagues. This was epitomised by the reaction to the English Premier League's plan to play a 39th round of games abroad. The move was almost universally condemned – even within the UK – where it was seen as predatory, based on greed, and at the same time undermining other league structures around the world. Blatter argues that "6+5" is not only necessary to enhance the development of young players, but to combat the growing inequality between clubs and national teams. Clubs are also experiencing this same problem between themselves. He believes that the current situation is reducing overall competitiveness and making results easier to predict. If the situation is not addressed, Blatter argues, then the very basis on which football has existed since the latter part of the 19th century will be compromised. The EU aside, Blatter's most difficult task may be to persuade armchair supporters worldwide, that a levelling up of standards for the majority of clubs, as a consequence of "6+5", must be for the greater good of the game. FIFA has never traditionally been involved with the organisation of club football but that changed with the introduction of the FIFA Club World Cup in 2000 and its relaunch in 2005. FIFA Congress decided to move the event from its traditional venue in Japan by awarding the hosting of the 2009 and 2010 tournaments to the United Arab Emirates in a bid to increase its profile, although the Japanese were awarded the 2011 and 1012 tournaments. The 2007 FIFA Club World Cup saw a first winner from Europe when Milan beat Boca Juniors 4-2 in the final while other FIFA tournaments played during the year included the FIFA Women's World Cup in China - won by Germany with a 2-0 victory over Brazil in the final - and the FIFA U-17 World Cup in South Korea in which Nigeria beat Spain 3-0 on penalties after a 0-0 draw.

The FIFA World Cup is the most popular single sports event in the world and ranks alongside the Olympic Games as the focus of sporting attention in the years that the two sporting festivals are held. When FIFA was founded in 1904 it reserved the right to organise a world championship for its members. However, it took more than a quarter of a century for that aim to become reality and it wasn't until the Barcelona Congress of 1929 that a resolution was passed paving the way for the first tournament to be held the following year in Uruguay. The reason the World Cup was such a long time in coming was due to the huge appeal of the Football Tournament of the Olympic Games, the winners of which were regarded as world champions. The Olympic tournament had first been officially organised in 1908 but by the late 1920s there was growing disquiet amongst the members of FIFA that, because of the amateur ethos and the surge of professionalism after 1925, especially within central Europe, the best players were no longer eligible to compete. Although FIFA was responsible for organising the Olympic Football Tournament, the then FIFA President Jules Rimet realised that the best way forward was to organise a separate tournament that was open to anyone. Just 13 teams entered the first tournament, a figure that has risen to over 200 today. It may be the dream of every footballer to take part in the FIFA World Cup but only a very select club of players and nations have won the coveted prize; seven nations and 274 players to be precise. Staged every four years, the finals have been hosted by 15 countries with Mexico, Italy, France and Germany each having been granted the honour twice. For many years the hosting would alternate between the Americas and Europe but in 2002 Asia welcomed the tournament for the first time and in 2010 South Africa will entertain as each continent is given a chance on a rotational basis. Much of the excitement of the FIFA World Cup can also be found in the qualifying tournaments, which in some parts of the world are now spread over nearly three years. The 32 places in the finals are decided on a continental basis with the hosts, but no longer the holders, qualifying automatically. For the 2006 tournament South America had four guaranteed places, Europe 13, Africa five, Asia four and Central and North America three, with the final two places decided via a series of play-offs between all the Confederations bar Europe and Africa. For many just making it to the finals is achievement enough, although for the elite the aim remains winning the Cup itself. Not that the trophy is actually a cup anymore. For the first eight tournaments it was possible to celebrate by drinking champagne from the Jules Rimet trophy, but since 1974 the solid gold trophy is in the form of a globe, held aloft by two athletes at the moment of victory.

With the rapid growth of women's football since the 1970s it was a logical step for FIFA to organise a World Cup for women in 1991 to replace the growing number of unofficial tournaments that were being staged around the world. As early as 1970, 40,000 fans in the Stadio Comunale in Turin watched Denmark beat Italy to win the Coppa del Mondo while the following year the Danes won the Mundial 1971 in front of 110,000 fans in Mexico City's Azteca Stadium, beating the hosts in the final of a tournament that had been played to packed stadia throughout. In 1988 FIFA organised the FIFA Women's Invitation Tournament in China PR. Won by Norway, who beat Sweden in the final in Guangzhou, the event was a huge success although it isn't counted as part of the FIFA Women's World Cup record. The first official tournament was held three years later, in 1991, and again hosted by China PR. The winners were the United States, a major player in the popularisation of the women's game thanks to the seven million women involved with football there. Two of the tournaments since then have been held in the USA although the 2003 tournament should have been held in China but was switched to the States due to the SARS outbreak in the Far East. When China did host the tournament again - in 2007 - it was won by Germany, who by beating Brazil in the final, became the most successful nation over the five editions played.

For many years fans around the world were denied the chance to watch their teams play against clubs from different Confederations and vie for the title of world champions, but since 2000 that has become a reality. European critics railed against FIFA when the FIFA Club World Cup was introduced, citing an overcrowded fixture list, but after taking on their concerns, FIFA announced that from 2005 the tournament would replace the annual Toyota Cup played between the European and South American club champions and that it would be held annually thereafter. By adopting a straight knock-out format, with the European and South American champions joining at the semi-final stage, fixtures have been kept to a minimum. The 2009 and 2010 tournaments will be hosted by the United Arab Emirates before returning to Japan for the two editions after that.

The history of the Men's Olympic Football Tournament can be divided into three broad phases. Before the introduction of the FIFA World Cup in 1930 the winners were lauded as world champions, an honour won twice by Uruguay and England (playing under the banner of Great Britain) and once by Belgium. After 1928 the tournament remained amateur in a world increasingly dominated by professionalism, a situation exploited by countries from the communist bloc who were professionals in all but name. From 1952 until 1980 teams from behind the Iron Curtain walked off with every title, notably the Hungarians, winners in 1952, 1964 and 1968. For the 1984 and 1988 tournaments the amateur restrictions were relaxed with all players who had not taken part in a World Cup eligible to compete, but in 1992 the third major phase began when it became an age-restricted tournament for under-23s although three over-age players were also permitted in the team. Sixteen nations have won Olympic football gold although it is a competition that has been dominated by Europe with only four nations from elsewhere winning the prize. After the legendary triumphs of Uruguay in the 1920s it wasn't until 2004 that another South American team – Argentina – won, and the Olympic title remains the only major title not yet won by Brazil. In 1996 Nigeria broke the duck for Africa and that was followed in Sydney four years later by Cameroon. Four previous winners no longer exist as countries – the Soviet Union, East Germany, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia while there is also some confusion as to the inaugural winners. The team representing Great Britain was the famous pre-World War One England amateur team that was so instrumental in spreading the game across Europe, hence the listing as England rather than Great Britain. As with the FIFA World Cup the finalists for the Olympics are decided by continental qualifying competitions which in 2004 resulted in four finalists from Africa and Europe (including hosts Greece), three from Asia, two from South America, two from the rest of the Americas and one from Oceania.

Women's football is a very recent addition to the list of Olympic sports but in conjunction with the FIFA Women's World Cup it now provides the sport with a second championship of world repute, as, unlike the men's Olympic Football Tournament, the full national teams can enter. The 1996 games in Atlanta were the perfect launch pad for the Women's Olympic Football Tournament with the final between the USA and China witnessed by 76,489 in the Sanford Stadium in Athens, Georgia, while the average for all games was 39,362. The United States have remained the dominant force since winning the first final against China, losing to Norway in Sydney and then winning again in 2004 against Brazil. Whereas the participants for the 1996 tournament qualified by finishing among the top eight in the 1995 Women's World Cup, there is now a qualifying tournament run along continental lines.

Conceived in 1992, the Confederations Cup's purpose was to bring together the continental champions from around the world. Initially known as the King Fahd Cup, it was later rebranded the FIFA Confederations Cup in 1997 when it came under FIFA's control. Riyadh in Saudi Arabia staged the first three editions, but from 1999 other countries were given the opportunity to host the tournament in an effort to broaden its appeal and before the 2002 and 2006 FIFA World Cups it was used as a timely trial run in Korea Republic and Japan in 2001 and in Germany in 2005. After drawing criticism from within Europe, especially among the big clubs who complained of fixture overcrowding, FIFA responded by switching the tournament from a two year to a four year cycle. As in 2001 and 2005 it will now be used as a trial run before each FIFA World Cup with the next edition in South Africa in 2009.

Futsal, the five-a-side indoor version of football, has become an increasingly important part of FIFA's work and since 1989 there have been five FIFA Futsal World Championships. The first three were won by Brazil, the major power in the game, though that position has been challenged by Spain, who have won the past two titles. Via a series of continental qualifiers, most of which double up as continental championships, 16 teams qualify for the finals. Games consist of two periods of 20 minutes and any of seven substitutes may be brought on or taken off throughout the game as many times as desired.

As well as the Football Tournament of the Olympic Games, FIFA now organises four other major age-restricted championships. The longest established of these is the FIFA U-20 World Cup which before 2007 was known as the FIFA World Youth Championship. Since its inception in 1977 in Tunisia, the tournament has been held every two years and countries from all six Confederations have hosted the event at least once. The winners of the FIFA U-20 World Cup have all hailed from either Europe or South America, with Argentina having won six titles and Brazil four. At first, many were sceptical of the value of a youth tournament, especially with the problems associated with over-aged players, but it seems that this issue has died down, largely thanks to the harsh penalties handed out to those caught cheating. The FIFA U-20 World Cup is now seen in most countries as a vital step in the education of the top young footballers, where they can encounter high pressure tournament conditions and different styles of play early in their careers and it is surely no coincidence that countries like Brazil, Argentina and Spain, where support for the tournament is strong, consistently produce young players of a very high calibre. The first tournament, in 1977, was also the first global tournament to take place in Africa, with the Soviet Union beating Mexico 9-8 on penalties in Tunis. Through the years, many great players have graced the tournament, none more so than in 1979 when Diego Maradona led his team to a title that was celebrated in Argentina almost as much as the FIFA World Cup win the year before. Germany's only title came two years later in Australia, when they beat Qatar, the smallest nation ever to appear in a FIFA final. Then it was the turn of Brazil, who won the 1983 and 1985 tournaments with players such as current national team coach, Dunga, and the 1994 FIFA World Cup winners Cláudio Taffarel, Jorginho and Bebeto. One of the most famous triumphs came in Chile in 1987, when a European team won a FIFA tournament on South American soil for the first and, so far, only time. The triumphant Yugoslav side contained great names such as Zvonimir Boban, Robert Prosinecki and Davor Suker. The next two tournaments, in 1989 and 1991, saw back-to-back wins for Portugal with a group of players that were soon to become known as the 'Golden Generation,' notably Figo, João Pinto, Paulo Sousa and Rui Costa. In the 1990s, Argentina rose to prominence again, winning in 1995, 1997 and 2001 under the guidance of coach Jose Pekerman, and then again in 2005 and 2007 to seal a record six titles. In-between, Spain won a first title in 1999 in Nigeria, the first time a FIFA tournament had been played in sub-Saharan Africa.

The second of the FIFA age-restricted tournaments to be introduced was the FIFA U-17 World Championship, now known as the FIFA U-17 World Cup. It has been held every two years since 1985 and countries from all six Confederations have hosted the event at least once. Brazil and Nigeria are the most successful nations in the history of the tournament with three titles each. Competition has been much more open than in the U-20 event, with African, Asian and North American sides all challenging the supremacy of the South Americans and Europeans by winning tournaments. Right from the start, Nigeria beat Germany 2-0 in Beijing in the final of the inaugural 1985 tournament to become the first African world champions at any level. The Nigerians reached the final again in Toronto two years later, but were beaten on penalties by the Soviet Union. In the third tournament, Saudi Arabia were the surprise winners, beating Scotland in another final decided on penalties to give Asia its first world championship. By reaching the final, the Scots were the first and so far only host nation to make it that far. African supremacy at this level was then confirmed in Italy in 1991, Japan in 1993 and in Ecuador in 1995, with Ghana appearing in all three finals, winning in 1991 and 1995 and losing to Nigeria in Tokyo in 1993. In the late 1990s, Brazil, rather belatedly, began to flex their muscles with Ronaldinho inspiring his country to its first triumph in the 1997 finals in Egypt - a title successfully defended two years later in New Zealand. France was the first European winner for 14 years when they beat Nigeria in the 2001 final in Trinidad and Tobago, but overall the European record has been poor with only France and Spain reaching the final since the start of the 1990s. Spain's first appearance in the final came in 2003, in Finland, but they were beaten by a Brazil team winning a record third title. In the 2005 final in Peru, Mexico beat Brazil to win a first world championship for the CONCACAF region, the only confederation until then, apart from Oceania, not to have won the trophy.

In 2002, due to the growing interest in women's football, the third of FIFA's youth tournaments was launched, the FIFA U-19 Women's World Championship. After two editions, the tournament was changed to an under 20 contest to bring it in line with the men's event and from the 2008 tournament it will be known as the FIFA U-20 Women's World Cup. The two editions of the U-19 event were played in Canada and Thailand, and the rise in standards has surprised even those involved in the women's game. The USA and Germany have dominated, with the Americans winning the inaugural event and then losing in the semi-finals to Germany in 2004; Germany going on to beat China PR in the final. There were surprise winners of the 2006 tournament, however, when North Korea won their first FIFA title by beating China 5-0 in the final.

Antigua may be a cricket stronghold, but football continued to make good progress on and off the field with a crowd of 4,500 turning up at the Sir Vivian Richards Cricket Stadium in St Johns to watch the national team play Cuba in a 2010 FIFA World Cup qualifier. The match was lost but the fans were treated to a great game in which Antigua twice twice took the lead only to lose 4-3, thanks to a late Cuban goal. The return in Havana was also lost, ending Antiguan hopes in the World Cup, but the overall record in the season was positive with five wins in nine games, including a record run of four straight wins. Rotherham's Marc Joseph and Millwall's Justin Cochrane, the majority of the side is based in Antigua where the league, although not one of the strongest in the Caribbean, is well organised and provides a good basis for the sport. Antiguan clubs are regular participants in the CFU Club Championship and in 2007 Bassa qualified for the quarter-finals by coming second in their first round group - above Cuba's Pinar del Rio. They were then knocked-out by Trinidad's Joe Public, a defeat which cost them a chance of a place in the newly launched CONCACAF Champions League for the 2008-09 season.

Following the national team's disappointing showing in their debut appearance at the AFC Asian Cup in the summer of 2007, the Football Federation Australia moved in a new direction with the appointment of Pim Verbeek as head coach. Verbeek, an experienced operator who spent time working in Japan, Korea Republic and the Middle East, was called upon to replace Graham Arnold after the Australian's lack of exposure against Asian opposition was blamed - in part at least - for his side's failure to progress beyond the quarter-finals. The Dutchman, who also worked as assistant to Guus Hiddink when the Koreans reached the semi-finals of the 2002 World Cup finals, successfully steered his side through to the final phase of Asia's qualifying tournament for the 2010 FIFA World Cup finals in South Africa. The Socceroos saw off the challenge of Asian champions Iraq and 2004 Asian Cup finalists China to join Asian Games gold medallists Qatar in the last round, from which four teams are guaranteed places at the World Cup finals. Arnold, meanwhile, took charge of Australia's Olympic squad and successfully qualified his team for the finals of the Beijing Games, after getting the better of Iraq, North Korea and Lebanon. In the A-League, Newcastle Jets won the Grand Final, defeating Premier champions Central Coast Mariners thanks to a solitary goal from Mark Bridge. Any one of four teams could have claimed top spot in the league ladder going into the final day's play, with Newcastle, Sydney and Queensland Roar also challenging, but it was the Mariners who emerged victorious to earn one of Australia's berths in the 2009 AFC Champions League. That win also took them through to the Major Semi-final, where they defeated second-placed Newcastle to qualify automatically for the Grand Final while the Jets went into a play-off against Queensland, who had downed Sydney in an earlier play-off. The game went into extra-time with Newcastle eventually emerging victorious, setting up a rematch with Central Coast Mariners in the Grand Final, where Gary Van Egmond's team gained their revenge and the championship. Adelaide United, meanwhile, became the first A-League club to progress to the knock-out phase of the AFC Champions League in the second year of participation by Australian clubs. Aurelio Vidmar's team emerged from a qualifying group that featured Chinese Super League champions Changchun Yatai, Vietnam's Binh Duong and Pohang Steelers, to book a spot in the quarter-finals.

It's not often that the Primera División in Spain is cast in a supporting role to the national team, but by winning Euro 2008, Luis Aragones and his team have written a new chapter in the history of the game in a country where the club versus country debate has always been won hands down by the clubs. There may not have been the same public outpouring of joy in Barcelona and Bilbao as there was in Madrid but this was a team backed by the whole nation and that's what made the triumph special and unique - along with, of course, the exhilarating brand of fast attacking technical football that the Spanish showcased at the finals. Team spirit was the key to the success - Aragones left out Raul so as not to disturb the balance - but this was a triumph based on years of hard work and success at youth tournaments, where Spain has few equals. In 22 matches played from the start of 2007, to the victory over Germany in Vienna, the Spanish won 19 times, with the other three matches drawn - a sensational record that also earned them the top spot in the FIFA/Coca-Cola World Ranking for the first time. Spain must surely now be regarded as the top football nation in the world, although the Primera División is now facing some stiff competition as it seeks to maintain its superiority, especially from the Premier League in England. The title was won by an often pedestrian Real Madrid team who gave their rivals enough chances to catch them, opportunities that Barcelona especially, failed to seize. The title was a triumph for new coach Bernd Schuster as his team eventually finished 10 points clear of surprise package Villarreal and a massive 20 points ahead of Barcelona. It proved to be a wretched season for Barcelona with Ronaldinho, so often their inspiration in the past, a shadow of his former self. They did make it to the semi-finals of the Champions League before losing to Manchester United but that wasn't enough for coach Frank Rijkaard to save his job and he was replaced by Josep Guardiola at the end of the season having delivered two league titles and the European Cup during five often thrilling years at the club. In the Champions League, both Real Madrid and Sevilla failed to get past the first knock-out round and with Valencia finishing bottom of their group, it was a very ordinary season for Spanish clubs in Europe. There was some relief in an otherwise dire season for Valencia, however, when they won the Copa del Rey, beating Getafe 3-1 in the final.

Uruguay remain one of the last bastions of football in South America where the old values of one champion club a year still holds fast and in 2008 that club was Defensor Sporting. They won their first title in 17 years but there was nothing traditional about the way in which they won it. Like many others in the region Uruguay has an Apertura and Clausura stage to the championship, won in the 2007–08 season by Defensor and Peñarol respectively. The two then play each other but instead of the winner being declared the champions, a further match is required against the team with the best overall record in the season and that's where it gets bizarre because Defensor beat Peñarol in the play-off, qualifying to meet... themselves! 2008 saw the 20th anniversary of the last time a Uruguayan club won the Copa Libertadores but they came no closer to ending that run. Nacional finished runners-up in their group behind Flamengo to qualify for the first knock-out round but that's as far as they got, losing 2-0 on aggregate to São Paulo. The national team got their 2010 FIFA World Cup qualifying campaign off to a great start with a 5-0 thrashing of Bolivia and they then trounced Peru 6-0 as they look to make an increasingly rare appearance in the finals.

David Beckham's arrival in America may have been the story of the year for football in the country, but there was very little that he could do to revive the fortunes of his LA Galaxy team in the 2007 MLS season. They had a miserable time, failing to qualify for the play-offs, which given that eight of the 13 teams qualify, was a major disaster. Once again Houston Dynamo were the surprise team. Only admitted into the league in 2006 they met New England Revolution in the showpiece MLS Cup Final for the second year running and came from behind to win 2-1, with Dwayne Rosario scoring the winner to secure back-to-back MLS Cups for the club. Spare a thought for New England, however. It was their fourth appearance in the final and they have yet to win any of them, although six weeks before the final they had won their first trophy by winning the US Open Cup. One of Houston's most notable fans is boxing sensation Oscar de la Hoya and in February 2008 he bought a 25 percent stake in the club, promising to become actively involved when he retires in 2009. The 2007 season was the 12th in MLS history and for much of that time it has been relatively inward looking, focusing its attention on establishing its position within the United States and to that end it has been a great success. In 2007 it was the 12th most attended league in the world for which figures are available with an average of 16,770 fans attending each match. CONCACAF would now like the Americans to broaden their horizons by taking a more active role in continental competition and they hope that the launch of the CONCACAF Champions League will do just that. Along with Mexico, American clubs have been allocated two spaces in the group stage of the new tournament with those slots going to the MLS Cup winner Houston and the Regular Season Winner DC United. That could increase to four if US Open Cup winner New England and the Regular Season runner-up Chivas USA make it through a preliminary round. It is hoped that with more teams playing more games that standards will rise and that the tournament will attain a status that the previous CONCACAF Champions' Cup failed to do. On offer of course is the prize of a place at the FIFA Club World Cup. The US national team had a relatively quiet year, comfortably beating Barbados in a preliminary 2010 FIFA World Cup qualifying round to set up the enticing prospect of a first visit to Havana to play Cuba in the first group stage of the qualifiers.

CONFEDERATION AFRICAINE DE FOOTBALL

The biggest trend in African football over the past decade has been the ever increasing presence of footballers from south of the Sahara in the top European leagues which has, in turn, made the national teams a much more formidable presence in international competition. The Côte d'Ivoire, Nigeria, Cameroon and even the likes of Togo have seen their national teams take on a new lease of life thanks to their European pros. Nowhere has this been more evident than in Ghana, hosts and overwhelming favourites to win the 2008 Africa Cup of Nations. But football in Africa is much less predictable than in other continents, and once again it was the unheralded Egyptians who triumphed in the final in Accra to become only the third nation successfully to defend their title. North African players have made much less of an impact in Europe which has allowed the Leagues in Egypt, Tunisia and Morocco to operate at a far higher standard than in the rest of the continent. Egypt had a team based almost entirely on the outstanding Al Ahly side that has twice won the CAF Champions League in the past three seasons. It was this unity, self-belief and team spirit that won the day for the Egyptians, 1-0 winners over Cameroon in the final. Al Ahly came agonisingly close to winning an unprecedented hat-trick of Champions League titles but lost in the 2007 final to Etoile du Sahel from Tunisia. If ever a team deserved to become African champions for the first time it was Etoile, losers in both the 2004 and 2005 finals. Their record in other African competitions such as the Cup Winners Cup, CAF Cup and CAF Confederation Cup is second to none with five titles, but the big one had always eluded them.
